com-peer (kom-pēr'), n. an equal.
com-pel (kom-pel'), v. t. [p. t. and p. p. compelled, p. pr. compelling], to urge irresistibly; force.
Syn. COMPEL, force, oblige, necessitate. To compel denotes moral rather than physical force; but to force is properly applied to the use of physical force or a violent degree of moral force. A man may be compelled to walk if he has no means of riding; he may be forced to go at the will of another. Oblige expresses only an indirect influence, which may be resisted or yielded to at discretion; we are compelled to do that which is repugnant to our will and our feelings; that which one is obliged to do may have the assent of the judgment if not of the will. We are necessitated by circumstances, or by anything which puts it out of our power to do otherwise.
com-pend (kom'pend), n. an abridgment.
com-pen-di-um ('di-um), n. an abridgment. [ABRIDGMENT.]
com-pen-sate (kom'pen-sāt or kom-pen'sāt), v. t. to recompense: v. i. to make compensation.
com-pen-sa-tion (-sā'shun), n. amends; recompensea set-off.
Syn.; COMPENSATION, amends, satisfaction, recompense, remuneration, requital, reward. A compensation is a return for a loss or damage sustained; amends is a return for anything that is faulty in ourselves or toward others; satisfaction is that which satisfies the individual requiring it; it is given for personal injuries. A recompense is a voluntary return for a voluntary service; it is made from a generous feeling. Remuneration is estimated according to the condition of the person and the dignity of the service rather than its positive worth. Authors often receive a remuneration for their works according to the reputation they have previously acquired, and not according to the real merit of the work. A reward conveys no idea of an obligation on the part of the person making it; whoever rewards acts optionally. When evil is returned for good, that is a bad requital.
Ant. CORRECTION, loss, punishment.
com-pete (kom-pēt'), v. i. to enter into competition with another.
com-pe-tence (kom'pē-tens), n. the state of being competent; sufficiency. [fied; moderate.

com-pla-cent ('sent), adj. affable.
com-plain (kom-plān'), v. i. to express grief, pain, or resentment; charge formally.
Syn. COMPLAIN, lament, regret. Complaint marks most of dissatisfaction, lamentation most of grief; regret most of pain. Complaint is expressed verbally; lamentation either by words or signs; regret may be felt without being expressed. Complaint is made of personal grievance; lamentation and regret may be made on account of others as well as ourselves. We complain of our ill-health, of our inconveniences, or of troublesome circumstances; we lament our inability to serve another; we regret the absence of one whom we love. [See deplore.] com-plaint (kom-plānt'), n. an accusation; an expression of grief or pain; ailment.
Syn. COMPLAINT, accusation. A complaint is mostly made in matters that personally affect the complainant; an accusation is made of matters in general, but especially those of a moral nature. A complaint is made for the sake of obtaining redress; an accusation is made for the sake of ascertaining a fact or bringing to punishment.
Ant. COMMENDATION, eulogy.
com-plai-sance (-plā-sāns'), n. courtesy.
Syn. COMPLAISANCE, deference, condescension. Complaisance signifies the act of complying with, or pleasing others; deference marks the inclination to defer, or acquiesce in the sentiments of another in preference to one's own; condescension marks the act of condescending from one's own height to yield to the satisfaction of others rather than rigorously to exact one's rights. The necessities and the allurements of society and of intimacy lead to complaisance; it makes sacrifices to the wishes, tastes, and personal feelings of others. Complaisance is the act of an equal; deference that of an inferior; condescension that of a superior.
★com-plai-sant ('plā-zānt), adj. courteous. [CIVIL.]
com-ple-ment ('plē-ment), n. full number; a complete set: v. t. to supply (a deficiency).
com-plete (kom-plēt'), adj. free from deficiency; entire; absolute; finished: v. t. to supply; finish.
Syn. COMPLETE, perfect, finished. That is complete which has no deficiency; that is perfect which has positive excellence; and that is finished which has no omission in it. [See whole.]
Ant. BLEMISHED, defective, faulty.
Syn. COMPLETE, finish, terminate. The characteristic idea of completing is that of making a thing altogether what it ought to be; that of finishing, the doing all that is intended to be done toward a thing; and that of terminating, simply putting an end to a thing.
Ant. BEGIN, commence.
★com-plex (kom'pleks, not kom-pleks') adj. composed of various parts of things; composite; intricate. [OBSCURE.]
com-plex-ion (-plek'shun), n. the color of the skin, especially the face; aspect.

Syn. DISPOSAL, disposition. Disposal is a personal act; it depends upon the will of the individual; disposition is an act of the judgment; it depends upon the nature of the things. The removal of a thing from one's self is involved in a disposal; the good order of the things is comprehended in their disposition.

dis-pose (-pōz'), v. t. to place; arrange; order.
Syn. DISPOSE, arrange, digest. We may dispose ordinary matters by simply assigning a place to each; in this manner trees are disposed in a row, but we arrange and digest by an intellectual effort; in the first case by putting those together which ought to go together; and in the latter case by both separating that which is dissimilar, and bringing together that which is similar; books are arranged in a library; the materials for a literary production are digested. [See persuade, addicted.]
Ant. CONFUSE, disturb.

dis-po-si-tion (-pō-zish'un), n. the act of disposing; order; temper.
Syn. DISPOSITION, temper. Disposition is permanent and settled; temper may be transitory and fluctuating. The disposition comprehends the springs and motives of actions; the temper influences the action of the moment. It is possible and not infrequent to have a good disposition with a bad temper, and vice versa.
Syn. DISPOSITION, inclination. We may always expect a man to do that which he is disposed to do; but we cannot always calculate upon his executing that to which he is merely inclined. We indulge a disposition; we yield to an inclination. The disposition comprehends the whole state of the mind at the time; an inclination is particular, referring always to a particular object. [See disposal.]
Ant. DISINCLINATION, dislike.

dis-prove (-prōōv'), v. t. to prove to be false. [CONFUTE.]

Syn. EXTRANEOUS, extrinsic, foreign. The extraneous is that which forms no necessary or natural part of anything; the extrinsic is that which forms a part or has a connection, but only in an indirect form; it is not an inherent or component part; the foreign is that which forms no part whatever, and has no kind of connection.

Ant. Apropos, essential, relevant, intrinsic.

★ex-traor-di-na-ry (-trôr'di-nā-ri), adj. beyond or out of the usual course; uncommon.

Syn. EXTRAORDINARY, remarkable. The extraordinary is that which is out of the ordinary course, but it does not always excite remark, and is not, therefore, remarkable, as when we speak of an extraordinary loan; on the other hand, extraordinary expresses much more than remarkable. [See rare.]

Ant. Ordinary, usual, obscure.

ex-trav-a-gance (-trav'ā-gans), n. excess in anything. [EXCESS.]

ex-trav-a-gant ('ā-gant), adj. exceeding reasonable limits; wasteful; prodigal.

Syn. EXTRAVAGANT, prodigal, lavish, profuse. The extravagant man spends his money without reason; the prodigal man spends it in excesses. One may be extravagant with a small sum where it exceeds one's means; one can be prodigal only with large sums; lavish and profuse are properly applied to particular actions, the former to denote an expenditure more or less wasteful or superfluous, the latter to denote a full supply without any sort of scant.

Ant. Close, miserly, parsimonious, saving.

ex-trav-a-gan-za (eks-trav-ā-gan'zā), n. a stage burlesque; an irregular piece of music.

fail-ure (fāl'ūr), n. the act of failing; omission; want of success. [INSOLVENCY.]

faln (fān), adv. willingly; gladly.

faint (fānt), v. i. to become feeble; lose consciousness; swoon.

Syn. FAINT, dim, exhausted, faded, faltering, fatigued, feeble, indistinct, languid, listless, timid, weak, wearied. Faint has the general sense of lacking strength or effectiveness. A person may be faint when physically wearied; he may be a faint adherent because naturally feeble or purposeless, or because half hearted in the cause. Written characters may be faint or dim, either because originally written with poor ink, or because they have become faded by time and exposure.

faint-ing ('ing), n. a sudden and temporary loss of consciousness.

fair (fār), adj. beautiful; handsome; pleasing to the eye or mind; n. market: adv. justly openly.

Syn. FAIR, clear. Fair is used in a positive sense; clear in a negative sense; there must be some brightness in what is fair; there must be no spots in what is clear. The weather is said to be fair, which is not only free from what is disagreeable but somewhat enlivened by the sun; it is clear when it is free from clouds or mists.

Ant. DECEITFUL, unjust, unprincipled.

fair-y (fār'i), n. [pl. fairies (-iz)], an imaginary being of graceful and diminutive human form.

faith (fāth), n. belief; trust in the honesty and truth of another; the assent of the mind to divine revelation; a system of doctrines or tenets.

Syn. FAITH, creed. These words are synonymous when taken for the thing trusted in or believed; but they differ in this, that faith has always a reference to the principle in the mind; creed only respects the thing which is the object of faith.

Ant. DENIAL, disbelief, infidelity.

faith-ful ('fool), adj. full of faith; trustworthy; truthful; honest; loyal.

Syn. FAITHFUL, trusty. Faithful respects the principle altogether; trusty includes not only the principle, but the mental qualifications in general. It is the part of a Christian to be faithful to all his engagements; it is a particular excellence in a servant to be trusty.

Ant. FAITHLESS, deceitful.

faith-less ('les), adj. without faith or belief; unbelieving.

Syn. FAITHLESS, perfidious, treacherous. A faithless man is faithless only for his own interest; a perfidious man is expressly so to the injury of another. Perfidy may lie in the will to do; treachery lies altogether in the thing done. A friend is perfidious whenever he evinces his perfidy; but he is said to be treacherous only in the particular instance in which he betrays the confidence and interests of another.

Ant. FAITHFUL, honest, magnanimous, trustworthy.

fake (fāk), v. t. to fabricate with the view of deception.

fall (fawl), v. i. [p. t. fell, p. p. fallen, p. pr. falling], to drop from a higher to a lower place: adj. pertaining to the autumn.

Syn. FALL, downfall, ruin. Fall applies to that which is erect; downfall to that which is elevated. Everything which is set up, although as trifling as a stick, may have a fall; but we speak of the downfall of the loftiest trees or the tallest spires. A man may recover from his fall, but his downfall is commonly followed by the entire ruin of his concerns, and often of himself.

Ant. RISE, flourish, prosper.

fal-la-cious (fal-lā'shus), adj. deceptive.

Syn. FALLACIOUS, deceitful, fraudulent. The fallacious has respect to falsehood in opinion; deceitful to that which is externally false. Our hopes are often fallacious; the appearances of things are often deceitful. Fallacious, as characteristic of the mind, excludes the idea of design; deceitful excludes the idea of mistake; fraudulent is a gross species of the deceitful.

Ant. HONEST, sound, truthful.

fam-ish ('ish), v. t. and v. i. to starve.

fa-mous (fā'mus), adj. renowned.

Syn. FAMOUS, celebrated, renowned, illustrious. Famous signifies literally having fame or the cause of fame; it is applicable to that which causes a noise or sensation; celebrated signifies literally kept in the memory by a celebration or memorial; renowned signifies literally possessed of a name; illustrious signifies literally what has or gives a luster.

Ant. OBSCURE, unknown.

fan (fan), v. t. [p. t. and p. p. fanned, p. pr. fanning], to cool with a fan; agitate (the air), as with a fan: n. an object with a broad surface used to agitate the air; a fanatic (said of a baseball enthusiast).

fa-nat-ic (fă-nat'ik), n. one who is intemperately zealous, or wildly extravagant: adj. characterized by fanaticism.

fa-nat-i-cism (i'sizm), n. extravagant or frenzied zeal.

fan-cied (fan'sid), adj. imaginary.

fan-ci-ful ('si-fool), adj. influenced by the fancy.

Syn. FANCIFUL, fantastic, whimsical, capricious. Fanciful is said of that which is irregular in the taste or judgment; fantastical is said of that which violates all propriety, as well as regularity; the former may consist of a simple deviation from rule; the latter is something extravagant; whimsical is a species of the fanciful in regard to one's likes or dislikes; capricious respects errors of temper.

fan-cy ('si), v. t. [p. t. and p. p. fancied, p. pr. fancying], to imagine; be pleased with: v. i. to imagine: n. creative imagination.

Syn. FANCY, imagination. The fancy only employs itself about things without regarding their nature; but the imagination aims at tracing a resemblance, and getting a true copy. The fancy consequently forms combinations, either real or unreal, as chance may direct; but the imagination is more seldom led astray. The fancy is busy in dreams, or when the mind is disordered; but the imagination acts when the intellectual powers are in full play. [See conceit.]

Ant. RATIOCINATION.

fan-dan-go (-dang'gō), n. a lively Spanish dance.

Hadrian's villa. Now simply an assemblage of ruins, perhaps the most impressive in Italy, about fifteen miles from Rome, near Tivoli. It included the Greek and Latin theaters, so called, an odeum, thermæ, a stadium, a palace, several temples, spacious structures for guards and attendants, and many subsidiary buildings and devices. Of most of these there are extensive remains; and here were found many of the fine statues now in Roman museums.

Hadrian's wall. One of the most noted Roman antiquities of Great Britain, constructed by Hadrian between the Solway firth and the mouth of the Tyne, for purposes of defense. The work has been ascribed to Severus and others, but the opinion now prevails that the whole system of defense bears the impress of a single mind, and that the wall and its parallel earthworks, its camps, roads, and stations, were designed and constructed by Hadrian alone.

hap-less (hap′les), adj. unfortunate; unlucky; unhappy.

hap-ly (′li), adv. by chance; perhaps.

hap-pen (′n), v. i. to chance; occur.

Syn. HAPPEN, chance. Happen respects all events, without including any collateral idea; chance comprehends likewise the idea of the cause and order of events; whatever comes to pass happens, whether regularly in the course of things, or particularly and out of the order; whatever chances, happens altogether without concert.

hap-pi-ly (′i-li), adv. successfully; by good fortune; felicitously.

hap-pi-ness (′i-nes), n. the state of being happy; good fortune; felicitousness.

hap-py (′i), adj. [comp. happier, superl. happiest], enjoying pleasure or good; successful; prosperous; lucky; living in concord.

Syn. HAPPY, fortunate. Both words are applied to the external circumstances of a man; but the former conveys the idea of that which is abstractly good, the latter implies rather what is agreeable to one's wishes. A man is happy in his marriage; he is fortunate in his trading concerns. Happy excludes the idea of chance; fortunate excludes the idea of personal effort

Ant. ILL-STARRED, unlucky.

Hapsburg (haps′-burg), or Habsburg. In Canton Aargau, the stamm-schloss of the Austrian dynasty appears in an eleventh century document as Habechisburc, "hawk's castle." According to the well-known legend, Radbot, an ancestor of Rudolf of Hapsburg, while hunting in the Aargau lost his favorite hawk, and found it sitting on the ridge of the Wulpelsberg. He was so delighted with the view from the spot that he chose the site for the erection of a castle, which he built about 1020 and called Habichtsburg.

ha-rangue (hä-rang′), n. a public address or oration, especially extempore: v. i. to deliver a harangue: v. t. to address by a harangue.

har-bor (′bĕr), n. a port or haven for ships; any place of refuge or safety: v. t. to shelter or protect; cherish.

Syn. HARBOR, haven, port. The idea of a resting place for vessels is common to these terms. Harbor carries with it the idea of affording a resting or anchoring place; haven conveys the idea of security; port conveys the idea of an inclosure. A haven is a natural harbor, a port is an artificial harbor. [See foster, cherish.] hard (härd), adj. compact and solid; firm; laborious; fatiguing; cruel; oppressive; unfeeling; exacting: adv. forcibly; laboriously; diligently; near; with vexation, trouble, or sorrow.

Ant. CAST OUT, expel, expose.

Syn. HARD, firm, solid. That is hard which will not yield to a closer compression; that is firm which will not yield so as to produce a separation. Ice is hard as far as it respects itself, when it resists every pressure; it is firm, with regard to the water which it covers, when it is so closely bound as to resist every weight without breaking. Hard and solid respect the internal constitution of bodies, and the adherence of the component parts; but hard denotes a much closer degree of adherence than solid; the hard is opposed to the soft; the solid to the fluid.

Ant. Soft, shaking, wavering.

hard-en (härd'n), v. t. to make hard or harder; confirm in impudence or wickedness: v. i. to become hard or harder. [ABANDONED.]

hard-heart-ed (-härt'ed), adj. cruel; unmerciful; merciless.

hard-i-hood ('i-hood), n. effrontery; boldness; physical endurance.

hard-i-ly ('i-li), adv. with hardihood.

hard la-bor (lā'bẽr), work imposed as an additional punishment to a term of imprisonment.

hard-ly ('li), adv. with difficulty; scarcely.
Syn. HARDLY, scarcely. Where the idea of practicability predominates, hardly seems most proper; and where the idea of frequency predominates, scarcely seems preferable. One can hardly judge of a person's features by a single and partial glance; we scarcely ever see men lay aside their vices from a thorough conviction of their enormity.
Ant. Easily, abundantly.

hard-pan ('pan), n. in mining, a stratum of gravel or sand; a solid foundation.

Harz (härts) or Hartz mountains. In German Harzgebirge, were called in the eighth century Hart (Old Saxon hard, Old High German hart, "wood" or "forest"). The present spelling, Harz, is supposed to be due to a folk etymology which has made the name into Harzwald, the "forest of resin" (harz). The Hardt, a wooded range of hills near Carlsruhe, is the "wood."

hash (hash), n. a dish of meat cut and cooked with vegetables; a mixture: v. t. to chop small and mix.

hasp (hâsp), n. a clasp folded over a staple and secured with a padlock.

has-sock (has'ok), n. a padded mat or cushion for kneeling upon.

haste (hāst), n. celerity; speed; urgency; precipitancy: v. t. to hasten.

has-ten (hās'n), v. t. to cause to make haste; hurry: v. i. to move with speed; be quick.
Syn. HASTEN, accelerate, speed, expedite, dispatch. To hasten expresses little more than the general idea of quickness in moving toward a point; accelerate expresses, moreover, the idea of bringing something to a point. The word speed includes not only quick but forward movement. He who goes with speed goes effectually forward. This idea is excluded from the term haste, which may often be a planless, unsuitable quickness. Hence the proverb, "The more haste, the less speed." Expedite and dispatch are terms of higher import, in application to the most serious concerns in life; but to expedite expresses a process, a bringing forward toward an end; dispatch implies a putting an end to, a making a clearance. We do everything in our power to expedite a business; we dispatch a great deal of business within a given time.
Ant. Check, delay, impede, retard.

hatch-et ('et), n. a small ax.

hatch-way ('wā), n. a rectangular opening in the deck of a vessel for passage below.

hate (hāt), v. t. to dislike intensely; abhor; detest: n. hatred.
Syn. HATE, detest. To hate is a personal feeling directed toward the object independently of its qualities; to detest is a feeling independent of the person, and altogether dependent upon the nature of the thing. One hates, but not detests, the person who has done an injury to one's self; and that one detests, rather than hates the person who has done injuries to others.
Ant. Affect, dote, love.

hate-ful ('fool), adj. causing hate.
Syn. HATEFUL, odious. Hateful is properly applied to whatever violates general principles of morality; lying and swearing are hateful vices; odious is more commonly applied to such things as affect the interests of others, and bring odium upon the individual.
Ant. Congenial, pleasant.

ha-tred (hā'tred), n. bitter aversion; continued hostility of feeling; detestation. [ABOMINATION, ANTIPATHY.]

Portland, Me. In 1786, "an act for erecting that part of the town of Falmouth in the county of Cumberland commonly known as the Neck into a town by the name of Portland." The name was recommended from its being the oldest English name in that section, given to a large island in the harbor, the name of the main channel (Portland sound) and the mainland opposite (Portland head).
Portland, Ore. Named in compliment to Portland, Me. F. W. Pettygrove and Gen. A. L. Lovejoy, in 1843, were the purchasers of what was afterward Portland, and of which ground they were the first occupants. As a native of Maine, Pettygrove desired to compliment Maine in naming the locality, and similar motives prompted his partner to call it Boston (his native place). The controversy was settled by tossing an old American red cent; the one who threw the most heads in three flips should name the town. The score is recorded; Lovejoy, tails, two, heads, one; Pettygrove, heads, two; and so we have Portland instead of Boston, Ore.
